Course Description:

The course exposes students to the scope and the power of modern travel writing. It endeavours to provide an intellectual framework for the understanding and analysis of this genre and introduces students to important critical texts. Students explore works taken mostly from within the parameters of literature, including fiction, non-fiction and poetry. Time is also spent on journalism, new media writing and film. Critical and theoretical responses to travel writing are explored, and an integral part of the students' responses to the works they encounter will be the production of their own creative writing.

Prerequisites: ARW 4195.

Aims and Objectives:

- To provide a critical, historical, literary, and cultural framework for the understanding and analysis of modern travel writing, and to encourage critical reading and research in the subject.
- To introduce students to key authors, texts, and themes of the genre, and to treat the multifaceted nature of travel writing in key literary, theoretical, and historical contexts.

- To encourage an appreciation of the ways in which travel writing interacts with the cultures from which it emerges and to explore a variety of intercultural approaches.
- To develop the critical skills with which to analyze, assess, and respond to the varied products of travel writing, including primary, secondary, literary and visual materials. Students gain insight into the practicalities of travel writing, through their own creative writing practice and/or journalistic pieces.
